lessness that the disaster is attributed.

The bodies of Peter Gumry and General Adams are still in the ruins. Judge James Glynn, who was at first supposed to have been in his room at the hotel, turns out to be at Holyoke, Colo., where he was spending Sunday with friends.

A vast throng surrounds the building on every side, pressing forward as far as the ropes will allow. The police are constantly guarding against any one stepping through the lines, on account of great danger that the front of the building may fall.

The loss of life by the Gumry explosion and fire is probably the greatest of any similiar catastrophe known to the city. There were in the hotel between forty and fifty persons, including guests and employes. Of these it is believed that 25 met with death. The only record of the persons in the building is contained in the customary hotel register, and this is somewhat indefinite as to the exact identity of many. The names of many of the hotel servants have also been hard to get, particularly the chambermaids and bell boys. The list as far as can be obtained of the dead, injured and missing, is as follows:

THE WORK OF RESCUE.

Awful Scenes of Horror Meet the Workmen on Every Hand.

Slowly the work of rescue goes on. Amid the tons of burning debris are scenes awful in their horror. At 8:30 o'clock this morning but two bodies had been removed. At this time several unfortunate victims were still alive. But death reached them before aid. At 8:15 o'clock workmen on the pile of debris in the center of the building uncovered the bony fingers of a human hand extending straight upward in ghastly whiteness. It was unidentified. Eager hands soon removed the ruins and the body of a man weighing probably 200 younds with short, black, curly hair and short black mustache was found. He was but slightly disfigured in face and body. One arm had burned bare to the bone. The body was in a doubled position and clothed only in an undershirt. Suffocation had probably overtaken him while asleep and death had come without suffering.

About 8:30 the firemen and a gang of laborers working among the debris in the rear part of the building came across the body of a man attired in his underclothes. He was lying on his stomach. An inch scalp wound was building could not have been more complete had dynamite done the work. Although three of the walls still remain intact the whole interior of the building is a mass of ruins, the like of which was never before witnessed in Denver.

Even the demolition of the Tramway power house in West Denver last spring could not compare with the ruin wrought by last night's explosion.

One of the bodies to be seen from the alley is only covered by a thin layer of bricks and plaster. One of the legs of the unfortunate, though, is pinioned underneath a huge girder, and on account of this it is impossible to take the body out unless the limb should be amputated. The smoke and fire prevents the rescuers from removing the girder. The unfortunate was in bed when death came, as close by is the remains of a cot on which he was probably sleeping. This body may be gotten at, in all probability, this afternoon some time, or as soon as the fire is all out.

At 4:45 the body of a woman was recovered. Her identity has not yet been established. She is partly buried under a mass of debris.

A few minutes before 4 o'clock the firemen engaged in searching the ruins of the Hotel Gumry found two bodies the first that of a boy about 20 years of age and is supposed to be Will Richards, who was employed as elevator operator at the hotel. The body was lying about the middle of the ruined building. His bed was on top of him and a supply of blank paper and envelopes was found near his right hand indicating that he was perhaps answering a summons of some guest when the explosion occurred.

At 10:30 p. m. the body of E. F. McCloskey, of Colorado Springs, a wealthy owner of Cripple Creek mines, was taken from the ruins. This with James Murphy, who died while being taken out, makes eight bodies thus far recovered.

The fire has been almost extinguished and 100 teams are making as rapid progress as possible in removing the debris, although at best the work is painfully slow.

CONDUCTOR BURT'S BODY.

The Charred Body of a Pueblo Citizen Found in the Ruins.

Three Pueblo citizens are among the victims. Of these the body of only one, George Burt, the Rock Island passenger conductor, has thus far been recovered. Shortly before Burt's body had been found a white shirt with a diamond stud on its bosom was found a few feet from the body of the unknown. Several employes of the Burlington road at once identified the stone as the property of George Burt, the Rock Island conductor. With the belief that Burt's body was near by the firemen redoubled their efforts and a few minutes later the vest and coat of Burt were unearthed. Fully ten minutes had elapsed when the charred body of Conductor Burt was exposed, tightly wedged beneath a heavy timber. In a short time the remains were extricated and conveyed to the morgue, where Levi Greer, a fellow conductor, identified it. In Burt's vest pocket his gold watch ticked the seconds while its owner's life had ended. Three $100 bills and a number of railroad passes were found in another pocket of the vest. On the dead man's third finger of his left hand the ring, the gift of his wife on their wedding day four years ago, was found. The body was badly burned about the lower limbs. At 7 o'clock last evening Burt arrived on his train from Colorado Springs at the Union depot. An associate of the same road accompanied him as far as Lawrence street, when they separated, Burt departing for the hotel. Burt was an employe of the Rock Island for the past seven years. He was considered one of the best railroad men in the west and was recognized as one of the most capable men in the employ of the company. Among his associates he was universally liked and was a great favorite among them. Mrs. Burt arrived in the city this afternoon and is quartered at the Oxford hotel. She is heartbroken over the terrible death of her husband. The body of Burt was viewed by Coroners Martin and Given and was then removed to the undertaking rooms of Farmer &
