Game For Biffers

Does Manager Shriver of the Pueblo Indians draw the color line or is he afraid to match his tribe in a contest with Willis Hood's Bessemer Biffers. Hood says he "dassent." A challenge was issued by Hood yesterday, but was refused on the ground that all dates were filled.

Hood was confident that his all-star aggregation could continue their long string of victories if they could get a match with the Indians. He bases his claims on two of his latest inventions, which bid fair to revolutionize baseball if his ideas become known. His first discovery is the gravity ball. He discovered that with a peculiar shoulder movement the ball would overcome the law of gravity, and before it reached the batter it would weigh twice as much. The ball resumes its natural weight as soon as it touches the ground. Another invention is for the use of the infield. A long sack is attached between the two knees of the fielder, long enough so that it will not interfere with the player moving about and will put an end to grounders getting away. Hood states that he will not have his inventions patented, but will donate them for the advancement of the national sport.

His expulsion followed active work toward reform. But undaunted by the fate he knew awaited him he faced the old peril again and during his present sojourn in Russia he has been active in carrying out the work he had started years ago.

The agitation of the League and Confederation of Professional reform organizations was the work with which the professor has been most closely identified in the last few months, and dispatches from St. Petersburg last night said it was while the central committee of these organizations of which he was a member, was in session that the police descended.

The immediate cause leading to the raid was an article from his pen violently assailing the new douma project.

At the University of Chicago, Prof. Milyoukov was looked upon as one of the most brilliant members of the faculty. He is an eminent scholar in several lines, though he confined himself
