Applying a buffer zone to alcohol and libraries could hurt Pueblo West special events

Events that are 1,000 feet from the Pueblo West Library and two other libraries in Pueblo County may not be able to serve alcohol if the commissioners pass a regulation making it illegal.

The Pueblo County commissioners are proposing a 1,000-foot buffer zone from libraries in Pueblo West, Colorado City and on the St. Charles Mesa that would not allow any future establishments that sell alcohol and tobacco. The regulation also may include an amendment that would prohibit a liquor special event permit within 1,000 feet of the libraries.

On Wednesday, the commissioners unanimously passed a resolution, applied for by members of the Pueblo City-County Library District, granting the same buffer zone for any future marijuana businesses. Similar county land use regulations and buffer zones are in place surrounding schools.

Pueblo County Commissioner Sal Pace said he voted in favor of the marijuana buffer zone because it's probably what his constituents want, but added that the debate is more philosophical than practical because there are no marijuana establishments within the buffer zones.

"It does make good optics and is a statement that we are listening to the public. I personally don't consider marijuana — licensed, regulated, secure marijuana operations — very dangerous or threatening," Pace said.

"I consider this more of a political optical discussion than a practical safety discussion."

Pace proposed the idea of the alcohol and tobacco resolution saying that regulations on alcohol and tobacco should be the same as marijuana regulations. Commissioners Terry Hart and Garrison Ortiz agreed.

The proposed alcohol and tobacco regulations have to go through several steps before they come before the commissioners. It's estimated that the commissioners would decide in October.

The new marijuana regulation and the proposed alcohol and tobacco regulation would not affect existing establishments.

The new regulation concerning alcohol special use permits, if passed, would not have an effect on the annual Bands in the Backyard, which is near the Tom L. & Anna Marie Giodone Library on the St. Charles Mesa.

The event requires special alcohol use permits, but does not fall within the buffer zone. Some of the event's camping grounds do, but the sale of alcohol does not take place there.

Darrin Tangeman, district manager for Pueblo West, asked if the commissioners could exempt Pueblo West from the proposed 1,000-foot buffer zone for alcohol use permits.

Pueblo West holds at least three large events in Civic Center Park that require special use permits for alcohol. The park is within the proposed buffer zone. Those include a Summer fest in July, an October fest in October and a Fourth of July celebration.

"We think it would be detrimental to a lot of our events," said.

Pace responded by saying, "In my view, if we are going to be doing a buffer zone for marijuana, we should have some sort of buffer zone for alcohol."

Terry Zupan, a Pueblo West director, said the amendment would devastate the area.

"While we do not as the district disagree with the marijuana issue, we implore you to please consider not doing the amendment on alcohol. The reason being is that our civic center is basically built around that library and as far as I can see, we really would be the only ones that will be impacted by the events and community gatherings," Zupan said.

"That is so important to our area with the functions that we have there."

Pace said he sees a flaw in bringing in the special event permit and the problems that it would cause.

"It also highlights the hysteria around marijuana and to some degree the silly nature of these fears," Pace said.

Chamber releases statement about proposed alcohol buffer zone near library

GUEST EDITORIAL FROM THE THE PUEBLO WEST CHAMBER OF COMMERCE JUL 18, 2017

Editor's Note

The Pueblo West Chamber of Commerce and its board of directors released the following statement regarding the Board of Pueblo County Commissioners' proposed measure to no longer issue liquor licenses within 1,000 feet of Pueblo County's libraries. The proposed amendment adds alcohol and tobacco to a measure the commissioners passed last week regarding a 1,000-foot buffer for new marijuana businesses.

It is the understanding of the Pueblo West Chamber that the proposed policy to create an alcohol buffer zone around libraries is currently in memo form only and has not yet been presented as a proposal for consideration.

As the process moves forward, we would ask our commissioners to consider the full ramifications of such a decision.

Although we have no philosophical difference with the idea of limiting access to controlled substances near government institutions where children and teens gather, we believe the implementation of any policy should include complete due diligence in full analysis of potential impacts to both existing businesses and special events that would require a special use permit.

We also have a concern for the business complexes across the street from libraries as this could limit new restaurants from opening in these locations.

As presented in The Pueblo Chieftain and The Pueblo West View, the proposal would have an immediate and significant detrimental impact to the entire Pueblo West community.

Both public parks designed and constructed with the intention of hosting community and nonprofit fundraising events in Pueblo West, Lovell and Civic Center parks, would be rendered useless for such purposes under a blanket policy that does not consider special use events.

It is our understanding that existing business locations would be grandfathered and that the limitations would only apply to future business establishments serving alcohol just in the way it would apply to future marijuana organizations within the buffer zone.

We do believe that the locations designed for public event purposes should also be grandfathered.

There are a number of locations that would be detrimentally impacted by such a policy, specifically in Pueblo West Lovell Park and Civic Center Park. Additional locations, such as Cattail Crossing must also be assessed for potential negative impact.

For the Chamber, as we have recently added a Community Festival to our annual events and are considering more, this is important to look at. Chamber fundraising impacts our ability to serve our local business members, visitors and the community at large. A portion of SummerFest proceeds also help the music program at our local high school. There are other non-profit, civic organizations who also use Civic Center Park for events to raise money that is poured directly back into our community.

Although our focus is Pueblo West, we are also concerned for our fellow nonprofits, such as the Buell Children's Museum and the Arts Center, which hosts Festival Friday's in the county-owned building. Additionally, the county's main library, the Rawlings Library, is located at the Mesa Junction business district, in the heart of the Arts Corridor, making it a prime location for potential future community events, which would also be threatened under such policy.

We have been informed the proposed policy is in the early development stages, and is not currently under consideration. We will again ask our commissioners to take their time, complete appropriate due diligence as to the potential future impact of such policy on our local business and nonprofit communities, and make appropriate accommodations, exclusions and/or limitations before enacting such a policy.

For the past year, Mike Velarde had been planning to open an upscale wine bar on Joe Martinez Blvd.

He planned on opening sometime in September or October, going through the process to obtain his liquor license later this summer.

After Pueblo Board of County Commissioners indicated last Wednesday that it would seek a 1,000-foot buffer for new alcohol licenses around the county's libraries, including the Pueblo West Library, Velarde's across-the-street neighbor, his plans have changed.

"I guarantee I'm going down (to obtain a liquor license) Tuesday," Velarde said, "and go after it full force."

The proposed 1,000-foot buffer for new alcohol licenses was suggested by the county commission as part of a 1,000-foot buffer for any new commercial, medical or industrial marijuana businesses.

The commission approved the marijuana measure last Wednesday, but instructed Pueblo County staff to also draft an amendment to include alcohol and tobacco in the measure, treating the three substances equally.

The proposed amendment must first successfully make it through the Pueblo County Planning Commission before the County Commissioners could vote on it.

Velarde said that any move to outlaw new liquor licenses would obliterate his business.

"Obviously it would ruin me," Velarde said, "and all the money I've put toward building it."

Now, instead of obtaining a liquor license being his last step before opening for business, Velarde said he is going to see a license as soon as possible. The commissioners' measure would only outlaw new licenses inside the buffer zone, and all existing licenses would be grandfathered in.

"When the time came (to obtain a liquor license)," Velarde said, "I was going to apply in the normal manner. But (the proposed liquor license measure) would push me to hurry along really fast."

If Velarde's business were to successfully get off the ground, his would be one of four businesses to serve or sell alcohol. Of those four includes Drive-Up Liquor and the Tumbleweed Tavern.

Whitney Graves, a 43-year Pueblo West resident who has owned the shopping complex that includes the Tumbleweed since 1999, said any measure against alcohol licenses would injure the area near the library.

"It hurts all of us," Graves said. "It makes it impossible for any restaurant, for example, because they wouldn't be able to have (a liquor license). Why do we want to hurt everybody that contributes to the economy?"

Graves, who built a 10,000 square-foot addition to his complex in 2008, which now houses four businesses, said even though existing businesses with liquor licenses wouldn't be affected, the future is what concerns him.

"We were there before that library was even built," Graves said. "I don't care about being grandfathered. I care about next year, when someone wants to a liquor license somewhere and can't do it."

Chamber releases statement about proposed alcohol buffer zone near library

Business owners alarmed by alcohol buffer

Colorado Mountain College weighs ballot question to deal with Gallagher impacts

John StroudGlenwood Springs Post Independent

June 26, 2017

Population growth and a booming Front Range housing market are having a negative effect on Colorado Mountain College finances, which could mean voters in the six-county taxing district will face some big decisions.

The fiscal dilemma is being triggered by the 1982 Gallagher amendment, which maintains Colorado's base property tax ratio at 55 percent for commercial property and 45 percent for residential.

While commercial property is assessed at a fixed 29 percent rate, the amendment requires that the residential assessment rate be lowered periodically in order to balance things out. Between 1985 and 2007, the residential assessment rate dropped from 21 percent to 7.96 percent, but has held steady for the past nine years.

However, a rapid increase in residential property valuations and a growing number of new housing units, particularly along the Front Range, meant that the assessment rate had to be recadlibrate again, this year to 7.2 percent.

As Front Range population continues to grow, the rate is expected to be adjusted again in 2019, and every two years afterward as long as the boom continues, Matt Gianneschi, chief operating officer for the college district, explained to the CMC board of trustees last week.

HAZY FUTURE

That means the college and other taxing entities that rely on property taxes, such as counties, fire districts and water districts around the state, will see a decline in property tax revenues as a result, he said.

The latest adjustment reduced CMC's revenues by 9.5 percent compared to projections based on increases in residential property values within the college district. That would have resulted in a revenue increase, Gianneschi said. He explained the net effect of Front Range growth far outpacing local growth, under the Gallagher provisions, is a revenue decrease for the college district.

If the statewide residential rate were to drop to 6.2 percent in the coming years, as projected by the Colorado Legislative Council, then it would mean between $4 million and $6 million less to run the college district, Gianneschi said.

CMC would need to see growth in district-wide residential assessments of between 12 to 14 percent in order to offset that, he said.

Trustees could float a ballot question seeking to remove CMC from Gallagher by allowing the district to adjust its mill levy as a way to maintain the same revenues.

That question could be on the ballot as soon as this fall.

"Ultimately, the goal is not to increase taxes, but to try to stabilize the impacts of these adjustments we are seeing because of Front Range growth," Gianneschi said.

If the board decides not to pursue a ballot question or if the measure fails, then options would be substantial service cuts or to increase tuition by a significant amount, he advised.

Trustees tabled a decision on whether to put together a ballot question for this year, but are expected to revisit the question in mid-July after more information is available.

If a ballot question is to be pursued this year, then county clerks need to be advised by next month, and ballot language has to be set by Sept. 8.

CMC trustees would also need to decide whether to set a permanent mill levy rate, set a revenue level and adjust the mill levy accordingly and whether to put a sunset clause on the provision after five, 10 or 20 years.

"My concern is that people will perceive this as the board having the authority to raise the mill levy and their taxes," Lake County representative Pat Chlouber said. "Whether that would be true or not, people are very concerned."

Similar measures in Lake County have failed on that perception, she said, "even though it wasn't a tax increase."
