It's a good thing Christopher Columbus never tried to race with any icebergs," ejaculated Mike the Duck last evening, "or most likely we would still have been thinking that this old world of ours is pancake in shape and that all the good things were on top. At that Chris had some time of it I guess. The Second Street Barber tells me that the first of our forefathers who had much trouble with icebergs was when George Washington breezed across the Delaware one dark and stormy night, and when Eliza pulled off that romp on the ice that made her famous. I don't know which of them came first but friends of Eliza have done more talking about it and besides her stunt was put on the stage.

"The Demmycrats held their primaries this evening but for some reason they seemed to forget all about that direct presidential primary talk they have been handing out and demanding that the Republicans listen to and take heed of.

LAZEAR WORKED AT PUEBLO DAIRY

That Jay Lazear, the man who was killed in a wreck on the Union Pacific at Fort Morgan Friday, left Pueblo last Thursday and had been in Pueblo a short time working at the Minnequa and Goodnight dairies, was learned yesterday. Little is known of the man, as he had been in Pueblo only a short time. He has a father residing in Stubenville, Ohio, according to a local dairyman who was acquainted with Lazear.

The mangled body of Lazear was found under the wreckage of a freight train on the Union Pacific when several cars on that line piled up Friday afternoon. In this pocket were two postal cards bearing the name of "Jay Lazear, Pueblo, Colo." These two cards were the only marks of identification on his person.
